Coming out at work
The workplace is a particularly public and challenging environment in which to come out because it is quite literally the place where our livelihoods are on the line. It is also difficult to avoid, as the divide between our "work lives" and "personal lives" is, in many ways, a fiction. Here are some strategies to consider and ideas to keep in mind to make coming out a bit easier.

Time management strategies that really work
Stress is inevitable, it can even be healthy and manageable but too much negative stress can be detrimental to our physical and mental health. Stress reduction techniques are important, and developing your own toolkit for managing stressors is of vital importance. Discover more ways to manage your very valuable time.

Discrimination and harassment do not exist in a successful workplace
Each person views other peoples’ actions and words through a different set of lenses. Successful companies know that having more variety and diversity in the workplace brings a wider pool of solutions to choose from which is why it’s important for colleagues to embrace diversity and celebrate these differences, too. Celebrating diversity at work doesn’t have to be overdone, or forced, it can be as simple as taking advantage of project opportunities that encourage you to work with others of different backgrounds. Here are some more ideas to consider.

Upcoming webinars
I could be your father! Navigating work with a younger boss
November 18, 2016 1:00 pm CST

Do you know your limit? Healthy drinking guidelines
December 2, 2016 1:00 pm CST
For lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and queer people (LGBTQ), “coming out” is the term we use to refer to the process of revealing our sexual orientation or gender identity for the first time. Far from being a one-time rite of passage or overnight change, coming out is something LGBTQ people must do over and over again; to their friends, their families and indeed almost every time they encounter a new person, group, or situation. It is a process that is different for everyone - some people come out to everyone in their lives immediately, others take their time and still others choose never to come out to certain people or groups. One thing that coming out has in common for most LGBTQ people is that it is not always easy and is indeed often laced with anxiety and fear of being ostracized and/or excluded.

The workplace is a particularly public and challenging environment in which to come out because it is quite literally the place where our livelihoods are on the line. It is also difficult to avoid, as the divide between our “work lives” and “personal lives” is, in many ways, a fiction. At work we discuss our families and even bring our partners to holiday parties.

If coming out at work feels stressful or scary for you or someone you know, here are some strategies to consider and ideas to keep in mind to make coming out a bit easier.

Look for your workplace’s discrimination policy
Most workplaces have an anti-discrimination policy in place that should cover sexual orientation and gender identity. Familiarizing yourself with this can take some of the stress away, not necessarily all of it, unfortunately, as official policies don’t necessarily prevent day-to-day discrimination.

Are other people out in your workplace?
Listen to your colleagues talk about their personal lives and you may notice that there are other LGBTQ people who speak openly about their identities already. This is a great opener and you can start by speaking to one of them about coming out and how they experienced it. It’s also a good indicator that you will be met with acceptance should you choose to come out.

Test the waters
If you are worried about how people will react or if you don’t want to immediately put your personal life on display, start by talking about LGBTQ movies, current events and news items. This is a great way to gauge peoples’ reactions and get a sense of how tolerant your workplace is.

Start small by telling one trusted person
Even if you cannot identify other LGBTQ people right away, perhaps you have made a friend at work who you feel comfortable enough with to divulge your identity to. Starting with one person is likely to be less frightening than telling everyone at once.

There are many ways to come out
You need not make a big announcement - you can do things like place a picture of you and your partner on your desk put a gay-pride related sticker or sign in your office, have your partner pick you up or casually mention them in conversation.

Though the visibility of LGBTQ people has increased and has gained more formal rights, discrimination still exists and it is possible that you will meet some people who unfortunately are prejudiced against your identity. If this becomes a problem, speak to a counselor and/or to management about your concerns.

Though coming out may seem daunting at times, being open about who you are can be rewarding and it can also ease the stress and extra energy you’re expending hiding it, which will allow you to focus on your work as well as your friendships at work.
Stress is inevitable, it can even be healthy and manageable but too much negative stress can be detrimental to our physical and mental health. Stress reduction techniques are important, and developing your own toolkit for managing stressors is of vital importance. Another aspect of stress management is prevention and one of the most important ways to prevent stress is to have effective time-management strategies. Time management, as we all know too well, is one of those things that may sound easy but can be really difficult to implement; procrastination, blurry priorities and inaccurate estimates of how long things take can be significant obstacles to a well-managed schedule. Below you will find some tips that really do work to help you manage your very valuable time.

Prioritize
Take a look at the tasks ahead of you and rate them according to these four categories:

- Important and urgent
- Important but not urgent
- Urgent but not important
- Neither urgent nor important

People with optimal time management spend most of their time on tasks that are important but not urgent, decreasing the chances that an important task will become urgent and thus more stressful.

Start your day by scheduling your day
At the beginning of the day, take notice of what needs to get done and take a guess at how long it will take. Then, make a schedule for the day according to this list. Stick to your schedule. Taking 30 minutes to do this will actually save you time in the long run.

Learn how long things take
Record how long tasks take. You may find things you thought took a long time actually can be accomplished quite quickly, while tasks you thought you would breeze through indeed take longer than anticipated.

Break correspondence into the four D’s
Emails tend to be overwhelming and suck up a lot of time. When you look at your inbox, apply the four D’s:

- Delete: Many emails can be deleted immediately, so get rid of them
- Do: Emails that are urgent and/or have a simple answer can be responded to immediately
- Delegate: If you are not the right person to field the email, forward it to the person who is
- Defer: For emails that require more attention and further thought, flag them for later

Work in short time chunks
When overload hits, it’s important to prioritize tasks and manage your time wisely. Rather than working “non-stop” until something is finished, work in short 25 minute chunks with 5-minute breaks in between. The challenge lies in internalizing the habits of monitoring time and regularly analyzing and revising your time management plan until it works for you.

Schedule “time-wasters”
It is unrealistic to completely eliminate so called “time wasters” like social media and browsing. Instead, work them into your schedule and stick to that schedule.

Leave buffer time
Things won’t take exactly how long you think they will. When you schedule your day, leave room for the unexpected by adding five to ten minutes to either side of each task.

Time management requires diligent effort because for most of us, it does not come naturally. These tips are proven to work but only if you actually implement and adhere to them. “It only works if you do it” may seem like an overstatement of simplicity but it is all too easy to do these things for a week and then let them fall away and return to old habits. Move through the growing pains and keep at it, eventually these techniques will replace old habits with new ones and get you ahead of the curve on stress.
Upcoming webinars

I could be your father! Navigating work with a younger boss

For some, being supervised by someone younger than you can be a though pill to swallow. The reality is that the longer you’re in the workforce, the more likely this will happen. Don’t get caught up in feelings of resentment or frustration - after all, age is just a number! Learn how you can have an effective, enjoyable, and mutually beneficial working relationship.

November 18, 2016 1:00 pm CST

register

Do you know your limit? Healthy drinking guidelines

Worried about repeating last year’s exhibition of dancing on the table during your company holiday party? Has the glass of wine a week turned into a couple every other night? Or are you worried about a colleague who usually has one too many with a business lunch? It’s important to know healthy drinking and when “just a couple” becomes too much.

December 2, 2016 1:00 pm CST

register